PREFACE

This year's edition of The Banking Litigation Law Review demonstrates that litigation involving banks shows little sign of slowing and continues to evolve.

Disputes that have arisen in the past year cover a broad spectrum, from claims by consumers against banks (relating to losses incurred either to the bank or to third parties) to claims by banks for the recovery of loans and the enforcement of guarantees. Cross-border issues frequently arise, with banking litigation continuing to be a key area of focus for international commercial litigation.

One of the major challenges of 2020 has, of course, been covid-19, and this year has demonstrated the resilience and flexibility of court systems around the world, including in the UK, in adapting their procedures in order to minimise disruption to the administration of justice. At the time of writing, the 'new normal' in many jurisdictions now provides for virtual hearings (including remote witness evidence) and electronic trial bundles as a default. This enforced experiment seems likely to have a lasting impact on court procedures around the world. While it is likely that trials involving witness evidence will revert to being largely in person, the need to do so for many procedural applications is less obvious. In any event, it is to be hoped that some of the positive aspects of operating remotely – for example the reduction in the amount of paper used – are here to stay.

A continuing trend is the increase in the use of class or multi-party actions and representative claims. Although often perceived as a predominantly US phenomenon, the past year has seen growth in the use of class actions within non-US jurisdictions, particularly in the UK, Canada and Australia. Whether this rise is the precursor to a worldwide adoption will depend on a number of factors, including any new mechanisms for group actions that are adopted in countries where they did not previously exist and the way courts in different jurisdictions react to such new actions. In the UK, for example, judgment is keenly awaited in a Supreme Court case that is expected to play a key role in clarifying the operation of a new collective proceedings regime and, depending on its outcome, either energise or curtail the growth of competition class actions in the UK. Related to the rise of group actions, one potential area of reform is third party litigation funding (a frequent driver of such actions). Recent regulatory reforms in Australia means that litigation funders are now required to hold a licence and must comply with the same conduct obligations to which banks and other credit providers are subject, including the requirement to provide their licensed 'financial services' efficiently, honestly and fairly. It will be interesting to see whether other jurisdictions follow suit.

The preface to last year's edition highlighted the concern that claimants will seek to use data protection legislation, including the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) in the European Union, as a tool in litigation, and noted that this concern is only likely to grow. The rise of UK class action cases for damages resulting from data breaches in the past year reinforces the importance of banks managing such risks, both in a regulatory and in a litigation context. Set against the background of increasingly litigious and well-funded claimants, and considering the extensive volume of personal data that banks hold, the need for adequate systems and controls to protect the data of consumers and employees is ever more vital.

At the time of writing, the Brexit transition period is drawing to an end, and nobody is any closer to being able to say what the political or economic impact of Brexit will be. The prospect of the transition period ending with no deal is a real possibility, and it remains to be seen whether the UK can agree a deal with the European Union in the time available. The UK government has declared its intention to sign up to either or both of the 2007 Lugano Convention and 2005 Hague Convention on Choice of Court Agreements, but unless and until that happens there remains a degree of uncertainty over jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments.

Overall, 2020 has no doubt been a tumultuous year for many. As the year approaches its end, there are some reasons for optimism: global stock markets surged following the results of the US 2020 presidential elections and news of significant strides being made in the development of a covid-19 vaccine. Nevertheless, a substantial amount of political and economic uncertainty remains. Moving forward, the prospect of an unknown future legal landscape in the UK, and to an extent in the remainder of the EU, following Brexit and the continuing effect of covid-19 on the world economy (which may well persist long after the virus itself has been contained) can be expected to generate disputes in the banking sector for a long time to come.

I OVERVIEW

In recent years, banking litigation in Spain has been governed by several judicial resolutions that have increased the number of claims brought against financial entities. Given that a significant number of Spanish courts have positioned themselves as pro-consumer, judicial proceedings against financial entities have overwhelmed Spanish courts in the last decade. This led to the constitution of specialised courts for certain banking litigation proceedings, the aim of which was to reduce the workload of other courts that were accumulating significant delays.

Spanish courts have shaped the current landscape of banking litigation, determining how to apply the corresponding regulation that, in truth, has not changed significantly in recent years. European Directive 93/13/EEC of 5 April 1993, on Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts, constitutes the basis on which member states have adapted their own national regulations. Its implementation in Spain was carried out through the introduction of laws such as Law 7/1998 of 13 April, on General Conditions of Contracts, and Royal Decree-law 1/2007 of 16 November, approving the consolidated text of the General Defence of Users and Consumers Act and other complementary laws.

These laws constitute the fundamental framework of banking litigation in Spain. Indeed, most legal proceedings against banks are initiated in our local jurisdiction based on their provisions and, essentially, on the provisions regulating unfair clauses.

In order to reduce the number of proceedings affecting financial entities, several laws have been enacted in Spain in the past few years. Their ultimate aim is to ensure consumers are protected against abuse from banks, and that financial entities are protected from allegations of unfairness or invalidity of their contracts. Examples include Law 5/2019 of 15 March, on Real Estate Credit Agreements (the Real Estate Credit Agreements Act), and the different regulations implemented by the European Markets in Financial Instruments Directive (the MiFID Directive), in the most recent version enacted in Spain in 2014.²

The main changes introduced by those rules will be analysed below, following a review of the most relevant judicial cases that have decisively influenced the current banking litigation situation in Spain.

1 Javier Izquierdo is a litigation and arbitration partner and Marta Robles is a litigation and arbitration associate at Pérez-Llorca.

2 European Directive 2014/65/EU of the European Parliament and of Council, of 15 May 2014, on Markets in Financial Instruments, and amending Directive 2002/92/EC and Directive 2011/61/EU have been amended (MiFID II).

II RECENT BANKING JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF RELEVANCE

Most judicial proceedings initiated against financial entities in recent years have been related to seeking a declaration of invalidity of clauses included in mortgage loan agreements on the grounds that they are unfair. This has led to several judgments declaring the clauses questioned by consumers to be either valid or invalid, depending on the case.

Prior to focusing on those judgments, it is worth mentioning the Supreme Court Judgment of 23 January 2020, which declared that courts can only conduct an ex officio review of unfair clauses in mortgage loan agreements if the validity of the questioned clauses is relevant and pertinent to solving the claim brought before them.

This has a significant impact on all proceedings initiated by consumers questioning unfair clauses in their mortgage loan agreements, as it limits the possibility of requesting that courts conduct an ex-officio review of every clause included in their contracts. This practice was widespread in these types of claims but, according to this recent judgement of the Supreme Court, consumers now need to clearly identify the clauses whose unfairness should be analysed by the court.

With the foregoing in mind, the most common types of judicial proceedings relating to banking litigation, as well as on certain significant judicial decisions rendered during 2019 and 2020 will be examined in relation to unfair clauses incorporated in banking agreements.

i Judicial proceedings concerning the invalidity of the ‘floor clause’

This clause, which is no longer used in banking practice following judgments on the matter, sets a minimum interest rate to be paid by the borrower, despite the parties having agreed on a floating interest rate, which was normally based on Euribor. In practice, as purported by consumers, this clause established a fixed interest rate despite the fact that the interest rate was labelled as a floating rate in the mortgage loan agreement.

The fall of Euribor in 2009 led to the minimum interest rate (the ‘floor clause’) being applied. Therefore, the consumers who had agreed to the application of a floating interest rate on their mortgage loans could not benefit from the widespread fall in interest rates. On this basis, consumers have been requesting that the floor clause be declared null and void on the grounds that it is unfair.

In the light of the above, the Supreme Court carried out an abstract and general analysis of these clauses and, in its judgment of 9 May 2013, declared them unfair and, hence, null and void. This judgment became essential, establishing itself as the judicial decision of reference on this matter. It should be noted that the invalidity of this clause on the grounds of unfairness entails the consumer being refunded the amounts paid in excess due to the application of the minimum interest rate.

Notwithstanding the importance of the above-mentioned judgment, there are still pending judicial proceedings dealing with the validity of these clauses. We refer to the proceedings initiated in 2010 by a well-known banking consumer organisation against the majority of financial entities operating in Spain. Commercial Court No. 11 of Madrid, in its judgment of 7 April 2016 confirmed that, in general terms, this kind of clause is null and void because it is unfair. On 12 November 2018, the Court of Appeal of Madrid confirmed this judgment, although it made several highly significant considerations.

In particular, the Court of Appeal established that the abstract and general analysis of floor clauses does not prevent consumers from initiating individual proceedings challenging their validity. In those individual proceedings, the specific clause must be analysed on the basis of the information provided to the consumer, as well as how it was included in the contract by the bank. It is therefore possible for a court to conclude that the latter acted with the necessary diligence and, thus, agree that the clause, in that case, is valid, as the consumer was informed of its content and the consequences.

The judgment rendered by the Court of Appeal of Madrid is currently being appealed before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court is expected to render a judgment that could determine whether these clauses are invalid in general.

Another subject of great significance in relation to these types of clauses is the validity or invalidity of the agreements financial entities entered into with consumers in order to eliminate this clause from their contracts.

Since the above-mentioned judgment of 9 May 2013, financial entities have been entering into agreements with some of their clients that include a clause by means of which those clients waive their right to initiate judicial proceedings against the bank. Some consumers have questioned the validity of these agreements, but the Spanish Supreme Court, in its judgement of 11 April 2018, declared that they are valid insofar as they pass the aforementioned 'transparency test'. This means that if the consumer entered into the agreement having been made fully aware of the consequences – that it would be impossible to initiate judicial proceedings to request the declaration of invalidity of the floor clause and a refund of the amounts paid, then it should be considered valid.

This approach was recently confirmed by the European Court of Justice (the ECJ) in its judgment of 9 July 2020, C-452/2018, in resolution of a preliminary question raised by Court of First Instance No. 3 of Teruel. In particular, the ECJ considered that the consumer's waiver is valid when consent has been given freely, consciously and on an informed basis, insofar as the consumer is in a position to understand the financial consequences of what was agreed. The position of the ECJ is, therefore, in line with the previous judgment of the Spanish Supreme Court.

Lastly, it should be noted that the Supreme Court judgment of 11 March 2020 No. 168/2020 declared that it is also possible for a floor clause to be declared null and void even if the loan was not designed for consumer use. In particular, this judgment refers to a mortgage loan that was aimed at financing the acquisition of a taxi licence, that is, a loan with a professional purpose to which the regulation of consumers and users does not apply.

This judgment considered that, even if the special consumer and user protection regulations do not apply, in light of the Law on General Conditions of Contracts, it is possible to consider that the clause was included in the contract in a non-transparent manner.

ii Judicial proceedings concerning the invalidity of clauses that foresee that the borrower must pay all costs arising from the granting of the mortgage loan

Some of the most frequent judicial proceedings in banking litigation are those initiated to request that clauses compelling the borrower to pay all the expenses related to the granting of the mortgage loan (essentially, the Property Registry and Notary Public fees, taxes, expenses of the agency in charge of processing the granting of the loan, and expenses resulting from the appraisal of the mortgaged property) be declared null and void.

The judgment that triggered claims challenging these clauses was the Supreme Court judgment of 23 December 2015, which analysed several typical clauses included in mortgage loan contracts, including this clause, and declared it to be unfair, and therefore null and void. However, subsequent Supreme Court rulings have qualified this judgment, particularly in relation to the consequences of the invalidity of this clause. We refer to Supreme Court judgments No.s 44, 46, 47, 48 and 49, of 23 January 2019.

In particular, the Supreme Court agreed that the invalidity of this clause does not imply that the bank should repay all the fees and expenses that have already been paid by the borrower. It should depend on which party benefitted from the services that accrued the fee or expense, as well as on what is regulated in the specific rules for each expense. For example, it is understood that, as the mortgage loan is registered with the Property Registry in favour of the financial entity, it is the latter that should pay the corresponding fee. However, it is also understood that the bank and the borrower should each pay half of the Notary Public fees because this service benefits both parties when the loan is granted.

The issue of stamp duty has been particularly controversial because this is the highest amount that borrowers usually pay when securing a mortgage loan, and rules that govern who must pay it are not very clear. The Supreme Court, when interpreting said unclear rules³ in the judgments mentioned above, has clarified that the borrower should pay the stamp duty.⁴

In any case, and as we will see later, the Real Estate Credit Agreements Act has definitively regulated which expenses arising from the granting of a mortgage loan must be paid by the bank and which by the borrower, to avoid further judicial proceedings in this regard.

Furthermore, the ECJ, in its judgment of 16 July 2020 (joined cases C-224/19 and C-252/19), has confirmed that, if the clause is declared null and void, national regulations should be used in order to determine which party should have paid the corresponding fees and expenses in the first place.

The ECJ stated in this judgement that, when a clause is declared null and void on the grounds of unfairness, national judges cannot moderate it, but must remove it from the contract. Some have understood that, in relation to the 'fee and expenses clause', this means that the bank should return all the fees and expenses paid when the contract was formalised to the consumer. However, this is not what the ECJ actually says: it says that, if the clause is declared null, it should be considered as if it had never existed, which thus justifies 'applying the provisions of national law governing the allocation and distribution of the expenses related to the granting of the loan'. Therefore, the ECJ's judgment is in line with Spanish case law.

Lastly, this ECJ judgment confirms that it is in accordance with European law to establish a statute of limitations for bringing action before the Courts to seek a refund of the corresponding fees and expenses, namely, the term of five years foreseen in Spanish law. However, the ECJ has not solved the question of when such a term starts.

The majority of Spanish legal opinion understands that it should start on the date the above-mentioned judgment of the Supreme Court of 23 January 2019 was published because this is the date when consumers could have been aware of the invalidity of their clauses. It therefore remains to be seen how national courts will apply the ECJ judgement in this regard.

3 Article 29 of Royal Decree-Law 1/1993, of 24 September, approving the Revised Text of the Property Transfer Tax and Stamp Duty Act, and Royal Decree 828/1995, of 29 May, approving the Regulation of Property Transfer Tax and Stamp Duty.

4 These judgments differentiate between the variable and fixed tax rate, indicating that the borrower must pay the fixed rate. The previous judgment of the Civil Chamber of the Supreme Court of 15 March 2018 already agreed in this sense; however, the Public Administration Chamber of the Supreme Court, ex post, contradicted said resolution. The Supreme Court, in plenary session and by means of said judgments, settled such contradiction by confirming that the borrower must pay stamp duty.

iii Judicial proceedings concerning the invalidity of clauses that oblige mortgage borrowers to pay certain banking fees or service fees

The payment of banking fees has also given rise to a significant number of judicial proceedings against banks that have considered the unfair nature of some of these fees. In general, Spanish courts consider the payment of banking fees by consumers to be justified if the bank has incurred an expense in providing an effective service, and the service provided is proportionate to the fees charged. For example, in relation to the debt claim fee, if a bank proves that it had to incur expenses in order to claim the non-payment from the debtor on several occasions, and the latter did not comply with the request, the fee to be paid by the debtor would be valid.

In particular, the validity of the arrangement fee, which is accrued as a result of granting a new mortgage loan, has been questioned. The judgments of the Supreme Court of 23 January 2019 mentioned above considered this fee to be part of the price of the loan. The Supreme Court stated that interest and the arrangement fee make up the main remuneration received by the financial entity for granting the loan. Thus, it is a fee duly charged by the bank.

Moreover, and as stated by the Supreme Court, when preparing and granting the loan, the bank carries out a series of activities that goes beyond merely providing money (e.g., examination of the application form, collection and analysis of solvency information, evaluation of the guarantees provided and preparation of the contract). All these actions, which are obviously necessary to grant any loan, would justify the lender charging an arrangement fee as part of the loan's price.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the aforementioned Real Estate Credit Agreements Act also regulated which banking fees are valid and should be paid by borrowers (specifically, restricting the banking fees to be paid by the borrowers to those corresponding to the appraisal of the property for which the mortgage is granted).

iv Judicial proceedings concerning the invalidity of clauses that apply the IRPH to mortgage loans

The Mortgage Loan Reference Index (IRPH) is one of the indexes used by Spanish financial institutions instead of Euribor (the usual reference rate for mortgage loans) to calculate mortgage interest. This index has been defined as being higher than Euribor (normally between 1.5 per cent and 3 per cent) and more stable (it drops less severely than the latter). Thus, some holders of mortgage loans who use this reference index have gone to the Spanish courts to request that it be declared invalid on the grounds that it is unfair, and that it be substituted by Euribor, seeking refunds for the amounts paid in excess.

To date, Spanish courts have approached these requests for invalidity in a variety of ways. The Supreme Court, in its judgment of 14 December 2017, agreed that this index is valid and therefore, so are the clauses that apply it to mortgage loans. This judgment, which could have led Spanish courts to adopt a consistent stance, has not, however, been followed by all.

Within this context, the Court of First Instance No. 38 of Barcelona, by means of its Court Order of 16 February 2018, requested that the ECJ render a preliminary ruling on the validity of the clauses applying this reference rate to mortgage loans. The final decision of the ECJ was handed down on 3 March 2020, following the conclusions rendered before by the General Advocate.

According to the decision of the ECJ, clauses that incorporate this index should be subject to the control of national courts and therefore, it is these courts that will have to determine whether using the IRPH was unfair. Hence, the ECJ does not consider the index (especially clauses that incorporate it into mortgage loan agreements) to be null and void in principle. The validity would depend on the knowledge the borrower had of the financial consequences of applying this index when entering into the agreement.

If it could be demonstrated that the borrower had full knowledge of the consequences, the clause incorporating the index would be considered transparent and therefore valid. Otherwise, the clause would be considered null and void, and as if it had never been incorporated into the contract. However, the consequence of this is not that the loan becomes free of interest. On the contrary, the ECJ has clarified that, in this scenario, national courts can substitute the IRPH for the applicable legal index (i.e., the corresponding legal interest), in the absence of any other agreement reached between the parties.

From this ECJ judgment, we can conclude that, once again, the ECJ refers to national courts in order for them to carry out the corresponding transparency analysis. The ECJ has clarified again, as is usual with clauses incorporated into mortgage loan agreements, that the validity of this clause will depend on each case, and that national courts have the authority to carry out the corresponding analyses.

v Judgment rendered by the ECJ in relation to the consequences of nullifying an early maturity clause in a mortgage loan

The ECJ, and consequently the Supreme Court, has already ruled on the unfairness of clauses that allows the early maturity of a mortgage loan in the event of non-payment of a single monthly instalment. However, in its judgment of 26 March 2019, the ECJ ruled on a number of preliminary questions raised by the Spanish courts that had yet to be clarified, concluding that:

- a* it is not possible to partially retain the early maturity clause in the contract; and
- b* taking into account the loss and damage for which the debtor would be liable if the clause were to be eliminated from the contract and enforcement proceedings were to be terminated, thereby enabling the creditor to claim all the debtor's property via ordinary enforcement proceedings, it is possible to replace, exceptionally, the clause declared unfair with the alternative rule established in Article 693.2 of the Spanish Civil Procedure Act. This would mean including an early maturity clause that enables early maturity when three or more instalments are not paid.

The Real Estate Credit Agreements Act has also regulated this issue, setting forth the requirements that an early maturity clause should meet in order to be considered fair and therefore valid.

III RELEVANT REGULATIONS ENACTED RECENTLY

i The Real Estate Credit Agreements Act

The Real Estate Credit Agreements Act aims to implement in Spain Directive 2014/17/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council on credit agreements for consumers relating to residential immovable property.⁵

The purpose of this law is to strengthen protection for the consumer and, at the same time, for the bank, by protecting it against possible allegations regarding unfair clauses and a lack of information provided to consumers on the conditions of their mortgage loan. The Real Estate Credit Agreements Act regulates the content of many of the clauses referred to above that have traditionally been challenged before the courts. The main changes introduced by this Act are:

Pre-contractual information and transparency

Pre-contractual information must be provided to the consumer at least ten days before the contract is executed before a Notary Public. The following documents should be provided: (1) the Standard European Consumer Credit Information Sheet (known as SECCI); (2) the Standard Warning Consumer Credit Information Sheet (known as FIAE); and (3) the draft contract to be signed by the borrower.⁶ Under this new Real Estate Credit Agreements Act, the information provided must be more detailed and should ensure that the borrower is fully aware of all the implications of the loan.

The Notary Public takes a leading role in ensuring that consumers are made aware of all conditions and clauses of their loan. For this purpose, the Real Estate Credit Agreements Act states that, before the contract is signed, the Notary Public must grant a notarial certificate to certify that sufficient advice has been given to the borrower, and that the latter understands and accepts the content of the contract and its risks. In addition, the Notary Public must perform a kind of test on the borrower, who should receive all the relevant information in writing.

Early repayment fees

The Real Estate Credit Agreements Act restricts early repayment fees. In particular, with regard to floating interest rate mortgage loans, the early repayment fee may only consist of a maximum of 0.25 per cent over the capital amount redeemed in the first three years, and for the remaining term of the loan, a maximum fee of 0.15 per cent must be applied. For fixed interest rate mortgage loans, the maximum fee to be applied during the first ten years of the loan's term is 2 per cent, and 1.5 per cent during the remaining term of the loan.

Possibility for the bank to enforce early maturity

Before the Real Estate Credit Agreements Act came into force, the early maturity of mortgage loans was considered valid after the borrower defaulted on a third instalment. However, under this Act, it will depend on the number of instalments due and not satisfied as well as on the phase of the loan's term in which the defaults occur. Specifically, early maturity would

5 Its scope is thus restricted to this type of contract and, in particular, loans secured by mortgage or other security rights over real estate for residential use, provided that the borrower or guarantor is a natural person, and the lender is a natural or legal person who carries out that activity on a professional basis.

6 The content of these documents is regulated in the Real Estate Credit Agreements Act itself.

be valid during the first phase of the loan's term when the unpaid instalments correspond to 3 per cent of the capital granted or to 12 monthly instalments; during the second phase of the loan's term, the unpaid instalments would need to correspond to 7 per cent of the capital granted or to 15 monthly instalments.

Default interest rate and incentives to convert the loan to a fixed interest rate

The Real Estate Credit Agreements Act sets forth that the default interest rate should be three times the legal interest. Likewise, it stipulates that the borrower must be given incentives for switching their loan from a floating interest rate to a fixed rate.

Fees and expenses arising from the granting of the loan

This is one of the most important measures introduced, given its impact on banking litigation. By virtue of the Act, it is finally established that the lender must pay all Notary Public, Property Register and administrative fees and expenses, including Stamp Duty,⁷ which arise from the granting of the mortgage loan. The borrower must only pay expenses resulting from the appraisal of the mortgaged property.

ii European Markets in Financial Instruments Directive

The initial deadline for the Member States of the European Union to implement Directive 2014/65/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 May 2014, on Markets in Financial Instruments (MiFID II) was 3 January 2017. As the European Commission ultimately extended this deadline, the Spanish government arranged an implementation process consisting of three phases, by means of three different laws:

- a* Royal Decree-Law 21/2017, of 29 December, on urgent measures for the adaptation of Spanish law to European Union regulations on securities markets;
- b* Royal Decree-Law 14/2018, of 28 September, amending the Securities Market Act; and
- c* Royal Decree 1464/2018, of 21 December, implementing the Securities Market Act and Royal Decree-Law 21/2017, of 29 December, referred to above. As this Royal Decree entered into force at the end of December 2018, it was implemented in 2019.

The main changes introduced, in terms of investments and investor client protection, were:

- a* Suitability and convenience test: investor clients must undergo a test to determine their risk profile, so that investment institutions can offer them suitable products. Depending on the results of the test, customers must be classified as retailers, professionals or an eligible counterparty, with less to more experience and knowledge, respectively. Investment institutions are obliged to review the products that their clients have contracted annually, and to confirm that they are the most suitable for them.
- b* Advice and incentives: depending on whether the financial advisors are dependent or independent (they are obliged to report this to the client), they may or may not collect incentives and retrocession commission.⁸ In general, independent advisors may not collect incentives corresponding to the sale of funds.⁹ Non-independent advisors may continue to obtain incentives, if they can provide evidence that they have improved the quality of the service provided (for example, if they give the client access to a wide range of third party products), and it is ensured that no benefit is being generated for the investment services firm without there also being a benefit to the client.

c Contracts: the provision of investment services, with the exception of advisory services, must be duly set out in a contract signed by both parties, indicating each of their rights and obligations. For advisory services, the recommendation made must be recorded in writing or by other reliable means.

d Training: MiFID II requires a more personalised service to be provided to each investor. Financial institutions that provide advisory services must ensure and certify that their investment employees are sufficiently trained. Thus, new training and knowledge requirements were established for those who provide advisory services.

e Transparency and necessary information: there is an increasing obligation to inform investors of the costs involved in acquiring financial products, as well as to provide pre-contractual information and include more details in periodic reports. In relation to this, and depending on the case, there will be a periodic evaluation of the suitability of the financial instruments recommended to clients. The new information requirements set out in MiFID II focus on three main aspects:

- the advisory service to be provided, that is, independent or non-independent, as well as the range of financial instruments analysed and their selection process;
- costs and associated expenses, both for financial instruments and for investment and ancillary services; and
- that regarding financial instruments and associated investment strategies, including associated risks and how the financial instrument in question may operate in different scenarios (both favourable and unfavourable).

The obligation to record all communications related to transactions carried out when negotiations are performed independently, and to the provision of services related to the reception, transmission and execution of client orders, was also introduced. All this compulsory information must be collected on a durable medium (hard copy or the internet), for a minimum period of five years.

IV CONCLUSION

Banking litigation in Spain has been characterised in recent years not so much by the applicable regulation, but by the courts' interpretation of it, often seeking help from the ECJ.

The current trend is to encourage greater protection for the consumer and, in turn, for the bank, by protecting the former in order to avoid the litigation against the latter, as the significant number of judicial proceedings initiated against financial entities overwhelmed some courts, leading to substantial delays. Good examples of this trend are the two laws mentioned above: MiFID II and the Real Estate Credit Agreements Act.

The legislator's response to the deluge of banking litigation has been to exercise extreme caution and ensure the protection of consumers and investor clients, thus reducing the chances of questioning, ex post, the transactions they have entered into. This is as a result of significant judgments rendered in relation to the unfair nature of certain clauses traditionally included in banking contracts, and some questionable attitudes of financial institutions.

It is therefore expected that judicial proceedings questioning the validity of clauses such as the ones referred to in this article will decrease, taking into account that almost all financial entities have now accepted the claims filed by their clients and have paid the amounts due out of court.
